

Speaking Script

This is a speaking script and the only time you would use this to give a speech is if precise wording were extremely important. YOU WILL NEVER USE THIS IN CLASS! EVER!

This is the introductory paragraph. This is what you will say to get the attention of your audience. This is what you will say to clearly introduce your topic. This is what you will say to relate to your audience and/or build your credibility. This is where you will make your thesis statement, and it may include: a preview statement of the main points of your speech and/or, an additional transition statement to get to the first main point.

This is the second paragraph and begins the body of the speech where you will state your main points and make your case. This is where you will state the first main point of your speech. This is your first sub-point to support your first main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-point to support your first main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is a transition statement that may be an internal review, preview, or signpost.

This is your third paragraph and where you will state the second main point of your speech. This is your first sub-point to support your second main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-point to support your second main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is a transition statement that may be an internal review, preview, or signpost.

This is the fourth paragraph and where you will state the third main point of your speech. This is your first sub-point to support your third main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your first sub-point. This is your second sub-point to support your third main point. This is your first sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is your second sub-sub-point to support your second sub-point. This is a transition statement that may be an internal review, preview, or signpost.

This is the concluding paragraph of your speech. This is where you will review the main points of your speech. A good way to do this is to restate your main points, and to restate your thesis. This is the last thing in your speech and should bring closure by referring to the introduction, using a memorable quote, or providing a call to action for the audience.
